Background

The Report of the AU/ECA High Level Panel on Illicit Financial Flows from Africa was finally presented at the 24th AU Summit in Addis Ababa and adopted by African leaders. The findings from the former South African president Thabo Mbeki led HLP echoes civil society voices from across the continent in highlighting illicit financial flows as a serious threat to inclusive development in Africa and calling for urgent practical policy action to stop the hemorrhage. One of the most notable findings of the HLP process is that illicit outflows from Africa are large and increasing at an alarming rate of 20.2% per year (according to Global Financial Integrity (GFI) calculations for the period 2002 – 2011). While observing that the dependence of African economies on natural resources extraction makes them particularly vulnerable to IFFs, the panel also point to emerging new and innovative ways of generating IFFs enabled by the digital economy and new technologies. In addition, the report singles out the issue of weak national and regional capacities as a major obstacle in efforts to curb illicit outflows, while making it clear that ending illicit financial flows is ultimately a political issue.

In the last few years there has been a notable emergence of concerted advocacy efforts from various civil society based groups across the continent rallying against the issue of illicit movement of finances from Africa. Indeed, today the subject of illicit financial flows is a key part of conversations on Africa's development road map as reflected in Agenda 2063 and ongoing processes such as the Financing for Development and the post 2015 Sustainable Development Goals.

While the present global attention around illicit flows is positive and indeed creates an important hook and rallying point to discuss key issues concerning Africa's development, especially the domestic resource mobilization component, it is equally important to recognize some of the contradictions and limitations of the present discourse and put forward coherent policy solutions that effectively respond to the specific African context

It's against this background that AUC and ECA are collaborating with a group of African Civil society networks led by the Tax Justice Network Africa to co- host a side event at the FfD3 meetings that will provide a platform for interactions among African policy makers, civil society, donors and international organizations delegates that will be present in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.
